

Early Wagon Trains: First Entered Utah in 1841

By THERON H. LUKE

When did the first wagon train go through Utah?

Not 1847, as many Utahns would venture, but six years earlier — in 1841. And in 1846 three — and very probably four — trains went through, one of them blazing a trail followed virtually in its wheel tracks by the Mormons the following year.

This was the ill-fated Donner Party, which followed the Hastings Cutoff from where Henefer is today over Big and Little Mountains and down Emigration Canyon into Salt Lake Valley. The next year Brigham Young told Orson Pratt to seek out the Donner trail and take advantage of it, which was done.

It was in 1841 that a wagon train of 80 people started West over the Oregon Trail, one of the first large single trains to make the journey. At about where Soda Springs is now, 32 people in 10 wagons under the leadership of two men named Bartleson and Bidwell branched off and headed south with California as their destination. They came into Cache Valley from the north and followed the Bear River down to about the site of present day Corrine.

Here they headed northwest around the northern tip of Great Salt Lake, following just about where the transcontinental railroad was to go near 30 years later. They headed out into northwestern Utah (then Mexican territory and part of a vast area known on the scanty maps as Upper or Eastern California) before turning southwest into present day Nevada and eventually to coastal California. Somewhere in northwestern Utah they abandoned their wagons, made pack animals out of their teams and continued their precarious journey. They were the real pioneers of wagon travel westward. It was a tremendously difficult journey but they all made it.

With them were Mrs. Benjamin Kelsey and her small daughter, the first white females to go through Utah. True, they traversed only the northern part, but their journey took them well within the bounds of Utah today.

With exception of trappers and army exploring and mapping parties, Utah saw no more emigrant travel until 1846. In that year two parties of horsemen and three or four wagon trains passed through Utah, with exception of one of parties of horsemen who came into the area from the north and back the same way. Nine men of the Russell - Bryant party on horses and mules came west from Fort Bridger down Weber Canyon into Great Salt Lake Valley, traveled around the south end of the lake, across the Salt Flats and on to California. John C. Fremont, army officer in charge of a small military exploring party, had traveled the Salt Flats (on horses but without wagons) the year before in 1845, and Lansford W. Hastings had come across them west to east on horseback early in 1846.

The same year the Harlan - Young (the latter was no relation to Brigham) wagon train went down Weber Canyon, coming out near present day Ogden and following virtually the same route as the Russell - Bryant Party.

Following the same route (down Weber Canyon) the Lienhard wagon train came through soon after the Harlan - Young group. The Lienhard train was small, but the total of the Lienhard and Harlan - Young groups was perhaps 60 wagons.

Somewhere in between came the James Mathers train, only

(Continued on Page 38A)

ARTIST'S SKETCH of Etienne Provost (also spelled Provot and Proveaux), trapper - explorer who came into

When The Heat's On, THEY CALL FOR OUR BRICK

WORLD BOOK Illustration by H. Charles McBrat

A Backbreaking Climb up a steep riverbank was just part of a day's work for the pioneers of 1840's. Sometimes friendly Plains Indians helped the settlers along the trail to the West.

PIONEER LIFE IN AMERICA / Crossing the Plains

By the 1830's, the first big westward migration had pushed the frontier to the Mississippi Valley. Pioneers were rapidly settling Arkansas, Missouri, and Iowa—states just west of the Mississippi River. Explorers, missionaries, traders, and fur trappers had gone even farther west and southwest. They told of great forests and fertile valleys in the Oregon region and other lands west of the far-off Rocky Mountains.

The stories of the trailblazers made exciting news for many midwestern settlers who, by the 1840's, were ready for new adventures. The news also stirred hundreds of families arriving from the East seeking places to settle. In 1846, the Mormons, fleeing persecution in Illinois because of their religious beliefs, began their journey to the valley of the Great Salt Lake in Utah.

After gold was discovered in California in 1848, the sands of fortune seekers joined the migration. See MORMONS; GOLD RUSH.

The westward trails led over great stretches of dustless plains and waterless deserts. They went through dangerous mountain passes, and crossed a recrossed rushing streams and wide, muddy rivers. Travelers had to be on guard every moment against Indian attack. But the first settlers of the Far West, like the earlier pioneers who had crossed the Appalachians, were eager for new opportunities. They were willing to risk their lives to reach the distant lands.

Some who set out on the westward trails died on the way, but few turned back. The men and women who succeeded became heroes of an important chapter in the history of the United States.